

Patrick H Jones (b. 1987, London, UK) begins each painting with observational drawings gathered from both lived and deliberately sought-out experiences. These fragments are spliced, repeated, and collaged, shifting their context to generate new and often ambiguous narratives. Jones embraces this instability—how imagery can become familiar, confusing, satirical, or revealing depending on how it's assembled and read.

His recent paintings explore the dynamics of communication and group behaviour. He draws parallels between the disinhibition of online engagement and the strange confidence of road rage: how people speak or act behind glass—or behind a screen—in ways they would never dare face-to-face. In his smaller works, figures appear separated by panes or barriers, metaphors for this sense of safety, detachment, and clouded judgement.

While his paintings can be sharply observant or self-critical, Jones resists moralising. Titles serve as clues rather than explanations, and he values the plurality of readings that emerge when viewers bring their own bias, taste, and lived experience to the work.
